Michael Cooney's "Cash on Delivery" is a farce centred on Eric Swan who, unbeknown to his wife Linda, has been defrauding the DSS for two years by claiming benefit for an army of fictitious lodgers, all of whom suffer from a variety of ailments for which they can claim. The play begins when Eric finds it all getting too complicated and tries to extricate himself by killing off his make-believe tenants. The first call he makes is to inform the council that one of his creations has died. He is interrupted in this by his real life lodger, Norman Bassett, who has no idea that Eric is claiming benefits in his name. When a few minutes later the DSS Inspector Mr Jenkins comes round to see another one of the fictitious claimants Norman gets sucked into Eric's web of deceit.
